Tories

■ Iain Duncan Smith talks tough

In December, Duncan-Smith flew to America for his first overseas visit as Tory leader, pledging his party's support for American attacks on Iraq. Sounding more like George Bush Jr. than the man himself, he said, "It's time they re-joined the rest of the civilised world. We won't let countries like Iraq off the hook. Now's not the time to walk away having only cured half the illness." Does Iain Duncan-Smith really believe it makes him a tough-talking statesman by demanding that a poverty-stricken and battered country like Iraq be put in a corner, demonised further and then battered some more? The British people see him as a weak, ineffectual and irrelevant politician, desperately playing party politics to try to revive the flagging fortunes of the Tories.

Media

■ National Lottery funds anti-British, pro-IRA propaganda

£287,000 of National Lottery money has gone to help to fund a Granada TV film which is in fact nothing more than pro-IRA propaganda. 'Bloody Sunday' has cost a staggering £3 million to make, and is full of anti-British fantasy. Writer-director Paul Greenglass was also responsible for the anti-white diatribe 'The Murder of Stephen Lawrence'. His latest piece of poison gives a totally distorted picture of what really happened during the rioting in Londonderry on January 30th, 1972, when 14 demonstrators died after the IRA used a Civil Rights protest as cover for sniping at members of the Parachute Regiment. No mention is made of the fact that the Paras had lost comrades to IRA snipers and bombers in the previous weeks. The fact that the 'peaceful' demonstrators had subjected the young squaddies to a hail of missiles and petrol bombs is concealed. The fact that the protest was illegal, on account of having been banned at the request of the Irish Prime Minister, is ignored. On the other hand, scenes abound showing soldiers shooting an unarmed man on a 'sit-down' protest, and shooting injured demonstrators at point blank range. Strangely enough, however, despite the fact that there were dozens of cameramen - including Republican sympathisers - present on the fatal day, such things have never been shown before. For the very good reason that they never happened! Still, as experienced media watchers know, TV programmes like Granada never let the truth get in the way of a good, anti-British story.

Crime

■ Mobile phone theft: time to restore order on our streets

After years 'in denial' about the reality of much of the crime in our capital city, the Home Office finally came clean about mobile phone theft. Just 8% of the population of London over the age of 10 is black. Yet members of that 8% are responsible for a massive 70% of mobile phone muggings in London. And most of their victims are young whites natives.

The figures for other heavily multi-racial cities are similar. In Bristol, for example, 63% of the muggers are black, but 92% of victims white. In Birmingham, more than half of phone thieves are black, although young Asians (mostly more accurately described as Muslims) are doing their bit to encourage multiracial diversity by being responsible for 34% of phone muggings. Young whites are responsible for just 9% of Birmingham's attacks, but make up the vast majority of the victims. Ah, the wonders of 'diversity'.

Multiculturalism

■ Commission for Racial Equality standing up for whites?

The latest organisation to acknowledge the BNP's influence and potential is the Commission for Racial Equality. They have, for the first time in their 25 year history, launched a campaign to help white working class males between the ages of 18 and 30, battle against discrimination! The CRE will pay special attention to their needs and will try to understand their grievances. The CRE acknowledged that it's only because of the BNP that they are taking this initiative. "The BNP garnered significant votes at the General Election because it listened to disaffected communities", the CRE concluded. This new focus on young white men was signalled by the CRE's chairman, Gurbux Singh: "Our way of thinking has changed, and that's because of the BNP". The Commission for Racial Equality campaigning on behalf of disaffected white youngsters? - that would have been unthinkable before June.

Transport

■ Transport chaos, renationalisation the answer!

The Great British Railways Disaster lurches towards the buffers yet again. Millions of commuters endure fresh waves of cancellations, late trains and strikes. Transport Secretary Stephen Byers has managed once more to beat a strong field and snatch the trophy for the most incompetent and ridiculous Cabinet Minister. Hardly in a position to criticise Byers for having been in India during the latest crisis, Tony Blair had to content himself with appointing former BBC chief John Birt to head a team to report on Britain's transport crisis. It was obvious right from the start that the phoney 'demonopolisation' scheme - involving train operating companies, rolling stock leasing firms, track maintenance contractors and regulatory authorities - would end in tears. But now that it has, the simple answer, renationalisation, isn't even on the agenda. Although renationalisation of the scattered and strife-torn remnants of entire British Rail operation is the only way to put things right, such a policy would be at odds with World Trade Organisation directives instructing elected governments to privatise state transport monopolies. To Labour, globalisation is more important than public service.

No Federal Europe! Keep our pound!

After nearly a thousand years of independence and freedom, this country faces becoming a mere 'province' in a Federal European Empire. On the 1st January 2002, the Euro was launched as the official currency of twelve European countries. The prosperity and security of over 300 million Europeans is being risked in a flawed political gamble, conceived by business, faceless bureaucrats and corrupt politicians.

Historic currencies such as the German Mark and the French Franc have been scrapped, and with them go political independence and the ability to make economic decisions. Billed as an attempt to make business across Europe easier, the Euro project is in reality an attempt to create, in the absence of democracy, a united Europe run by un-elected bankers. The power bearers of the EU have two things in common: no one elected them and no one can kick them out. Should the Euro prove to be a disaster, which no doubt it will, what can the ordinary citizens of Europe do about it?

Loss of sovereignty

Every day that goes by, the politicians continue to transfer more of our sovereignty and freedoms to Brussels. Britain at present sends nearly £2 million an hour to the EU in direct contributions, that's almost £50 million per day, and this at a time when our schools and hospitals are crumbling and our pensioners are forced to scrimp and save. And all we get in return is masses of totalitarian dictats and petty laws undermining our freedoms and destroying our culture and heritage, such as the right to trade internally in our traditional weights and measures.

The Euro: a giant gamble

From Berlin to Madrid, jobs, savings and pensions are being risked in a giant gamble, the only benefit to the nations involved being that Frankfurt will control their economic destiny as opposed to their own democratically elected representatives. Since January 1999, the Euro has slumped some 25% in value. The sheer unworkability of the Euro is openly evident: Germany needs to lower interest rates to kick-start its stagnant economy, while Ireland needs higher rates to stop inflation running out of control. But setting their own interest rates to suit their own national situation is now out of the question; they have to put up with a one-size-fits-all interest rate set by the remote European Central Bank! EU leaders meet in extreme secrecy every six months at summits behind barbed wire and patrolled by armed guards! All this long before protesters became a security problem. Tony Blair argues that with Britain as a member, the EU would become a superpower rivaling America. In fact Britain would be outvoted in whatever European institutions it sits on, kicked off the UN Security Council and would cease to have a voice on the G7 group of richest nations. Internationally we would be represented by EU officials! Some 'influence'!

Friendship possible without union

We want a great friendship with our European neighbours. The real 'anti-Europeans', are the ones determined to strip the unique peoples of Europe of their democracy and freedom and hand their destiny over to unelected bankers and Eurocrats. All we oppose (like all the peoples of European countries) is a European Superstate in which our economy will be geared to subsidising the poor regions in the rest of the EU while ignoring our own needy. Britain is the world's fourth largest economy - of course we can stand on our own two feet and run our own affairs once again.

Time to get out

Well under half of our trade is with the Euro zone, and most of that is financial. We don't depend on the Euro zone economically at all. But, we will lose everything if we allow the politicians to drag us into the Euro, and once in, we will almost certainly never get out. The vast majority of the British people are opposed to the EU and the Euro - it's time to say 'no' to the EU superstate and 'yes' to British freedom and independence!

The prosperity and security of over 300 million Europeans is being risked in a flawed political gamble, conceived by business, faceless bureaucrats and corrupt politicians.

The Clash of Civilisations

With the advent of the Euro, Nick Griffin ponders what form and shape a post-EU world would take

"The total failure of Marxism and the dramatic breakup of the Soviet Union are only the precursors to the collapse of Western liberalism, the main current of modernity. Far from being the alternative to Marxism and the reigning ideology at the end of history, liberalism will be the next domino to fall." Japanese philosopher Takeshi Umehara.

British and American soldiers occupy Kabul. President Bush threatens 'war' against dozens of other Third World countries, while Tony Blair lectures India and Pakistan like naughty schoolboys. Globalisation continues apace, with China signing up to World Trade Agreement free trade rules.

End of Western dominance

It's surely a strange time to predict the end of the era when the white West in general, and the United States in particular, dominated the world?

But this is the message of Samuel Huntington's The Clash of Civilisations. His key thesis is that the end of the Cold War's bi-polar division of the world has led not the permanent victory of Western liberalism, but to a world where global power politics are centred on the traditional civilisations and religions. The civilisations in question are Western; Sinic (or Confucian);

Islamic; Orthodox (centred on Russia); Hindu; Japanese, Latin American; Buddhist and African. The latter three being written off as of no great account.

End of history?

Huntington is dismissive of the 'straight line' theory of history, which sees all of human history leading up to Western style capitalism and liberalism – a teleological approach that may be traced from Victorian Whig historians right up to Francis Fukuyama, with his "End of History" fantasy. Instead, the author of The Clash of Civilisations harks back to the far more convincing cyclical history theories of Spengler, Toynbee and Quigley.

In such theories, the 19th century dominance of the world by representatives of Western civilisation was just one more passing phase – the period when the West moved through its Imperial period, a phenomenon common to all civilisations at that point in their development, and one that marks a high point which is inevitably followed by decline.

Huntington's case for the relative decline of the West is well made. The demographics of aging and declining populations in the West, Russia and Japan are presented in stark contrast to the exploding population of the Islamic world.

Race and culture

Although he conforms to Politically Correct norms by concealing matters of race as questions of 'culture,' Huntington otherwise pulls no punches: "Larger populations need more resources, and hence people from societies with dense and/or rapidly growing populations tend to push outward, occupy territory, and exert pressure on less demographically dynamic peoples. Islamic population growth is thus a major contributing factor to the conflicts along the borders of the Islamic world between Muslims and other peoples. Population pressure combined with economic stagnation promotes Muslim migration to Western and other non-Muslim societies, elevating immigration as an issue in those societies."

The Clash of Civilisations

First published in 1996, this book shot back into the best-seller lists after September 11th, partly because of its uncannily accurate predictions about Islamic terrorism, but more for its highly convincing account of the trends underlying the murderous anger of Muslim fundamentalists.

Also crucial to the West's loss of dominance is the rise of China, the core state of the Sinic civilisation. The trend was best summed up by Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew back in 1994: "The size of China's displacement of the world is such that the world must find a new balance in 30 or 40 years. It's not possible to pretend that this is just another big player. This is the biggest player in the history of man."

The rise of China

Huntington believes that China is becoming the centre of a newly vigorous Sinic civilisation block, including Taiwan, Singapore, Vietnam and Korea: "The Chinese government sees mainland China as the core state of a Chinese civilisation toward which all other Chinese communities should orient themselves. Having long abandoned its efforts to promote its interests abroad through local communist parties, the government has sought to 'position itself abroad as the worldwide representative of Chineseness.' To the Chinese government, people of Chinese descent, even if citizens of another country, are members of the Chinese community and hence in some measure subject to the authority of the Chinese government. Chinese identity comes to be defined in racial terms. For Chinese and those of Chinese-descent living in non-Chinese societies, the 'mirror test' thus became the test of who they are: 'Go look in the mirror,' is the admonition of Beijing-oriented Chinese to those of Chinese descent trying to assimilate into foreign societies."

Civilisational conflict

Even more threatening to Western dominance is the trend towards a Confucian-Islamic alliance. Huntington gives examples of the way in which China and Korea, and various Islamic countries, particularly Iran and Pakistan, have worked together to overcome Western attempts to prevent high-tech arms proliferation and to impose human rights restrictions on Oriental societies to whom such ideas are thoroughly alien.

Such attempts to force Western policies and values on increasingly powerful and self-confident 'others' are pinpointed by Huntington as perhaps the greatest single danger of the combination of Bush & Co's New World Order fantasy with the fact that the technological and demographic sources of Western might are running dry. All can still be well, according to Huntington, provided realistic Western leaders recognise that the world has changed, and accordingly concentrate on sorting out problems in their own states and civilisation, rather than meddling in the affairs of others.

Tackling internal problems

Huntington's view of the relationship between "the West and the rest" is summed up in one of his typically ultra-practical thumbnail sketches of reality:

Having virtually abandoned traditional Communism, the People's Republic of China is fast becoming a pseudo-nationalist ethnic, economic and military superpower, with a firm grasp of its own destiny

"The West won the world not by the superiority of its ideas or values or religion (to which few members of other civilisations were converted) but rather by its superiority in applying organised violence. Westerners often forget this; non-Westerners never do."

This being the case his recommendation is that, as well as henceforth keeping our noses out of places like Afghanistan, the nations which together make up the West should also pay urgent attention to their key internal problems. Huntington is particular scathing of the multiculturalists, who he accuses of creating unworkable and schizophrenic "torn countries" and of being hopelessly cut off from the real world.

"The clash between the multiculturalists and the defenders of Western civilisation and the American creed is, in James Kurth's phrase, 'the real clash' within the American segment of Western civilisation ... The futures of the United States and of the West depends upon Americans reaffirming their commitment to Western civilisation. Domestically this means rejecting the divisive siren calls of multiculturalism. Internationally it means rejecting the elusive and illusory calls to identify the United States with Asia."

Much the same, of course, can be said of Britain and other European countries, particularly Australia. Huntington advises us all to "hang together or hang separately," stressing the need for the nations of the West to:

- Maintain their technological and military superiority over other civilisations;
- Accept Russia as the core state of an allied Orthodox civilisation;

- Achieve greater political, economic, and military integration and to coordinate their policies so as to preclude states from other civilisations exploiting differences among them.

All this is relevant to the British National Party in two ways. First, it shows how much our stance against globalism and multiculturalism is in keeping with a growing trend in mainstream political thought. 'Outsiders' though we may still be in terms of present influence, the tide of history is running ever-faster in our favour. For all their present power, it is Blair & Co who are now swimming against the tide, and it is only a matter of time before it overwhelms them. In a world where ethnic and cultural identity are becoming the key factors in politics, it is inevitable that those who concern themselves with the ethnic and cultural preservation and advancement of their people will become key political players. Second, there is the clash between our long-held nationalist stance for complete independence, particularly in matters of defence and economic fundamentals, and Huntington's statement that the nations of the West must "achieve greater political, economic, and military integration."

Since we are going to be propelled to power by the early stages of a global Clash of Civilisations, in which the position of the West is more precarious than at any time in the previous 400 or so years, we need to give very serious thought to ensuring that our victory in Britain is used in a way which helps in the long-term battle for the survival of Western civilisation and the white race as a whole.

The new world

Particularly if nationalist victory in Europe comes about as a reaction to the failure of the European federalist dream of the bankers and bureaucrats, it is all too possible that the revival of nationalism within Europe would also revive the old divisions within Europe. Potentially, that could lead to a re-run of what Huntington refers to as "the West's civil war between 1939 and 1945," something that would literally be our final act of cultural and racial suicide.

In this new world - where such old-style clashes for dominance within our civilisation would lead to its total eclipse at the hands of more powerful and cohesive alien civilisations - nationalism which places the flags and state constitutions of the nineteenth century before the higher imperative of white survival would be a monstrous perversion of our dearest beliefs.

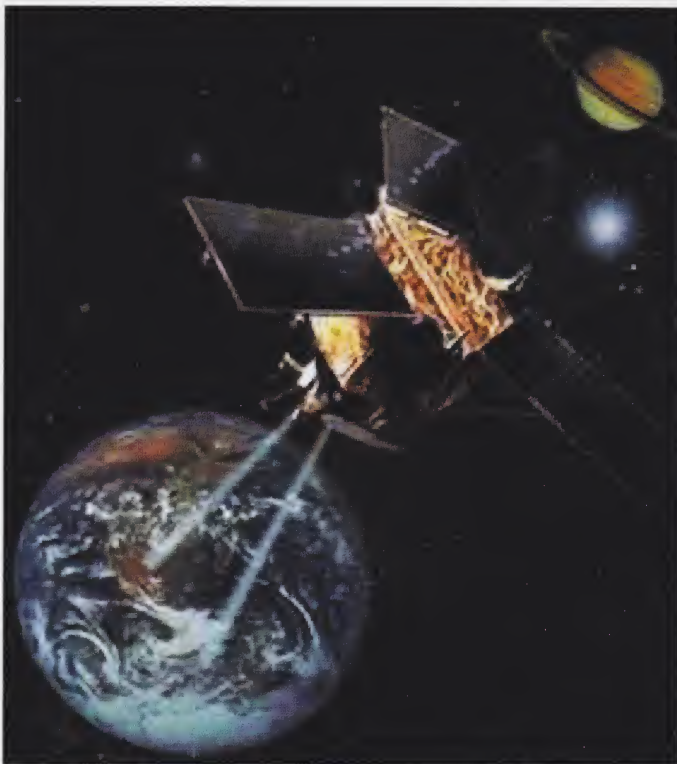

There is no question but that the popular consciousness that will bring organisations like the BNP to power across Europe will be centred on the old nation-states.

But while we must constantly look for ways to turn that consciousness to our political advantage, we must ensure that we don't get carried away by it. Winning in Britain, or in France, or Austria, or Australia, or wherever, will be a start. But having made that start, our foreign policies will have to be very different indeed from those of our forebears back in the days when the White Man had the world at his feet.

BNP SPACE POLICY: THE NEW

The time has come for Britain to set herself a new and ambitious national goal for the 21st century. As we stand together at the beginning of a new millennium, it is time that we ask ourselves: Are we still a nation of empire builders? Are we a people that would choose to be at the front edge of human progress? Or will we instead choose to honour our pioneering ancestors in museums and history books? Or even not to honour them at all, in order to conceal from future generations our own inadequacy? Less than a century ago, Britain was the effective capital of the world. Our empire was the largest, the richest and many would argue the fairest, that the world had ever seen.

The British were by far the most enlightened and technically advanced people on the planet. Our achievements stretched from the forests of Malaya to the deserts of Sudan. The sun never set on the British Empire. In comparison, modern Britain is a small island perched perilously close to Europe. A patriotic Briton may rightly ask, is there any possibility of restoring our nation to its former glory?

A new mission

It is for precisely this reason, that the British National Party advocates the establishment of an extensive British space policy. The scope of Britain's current space policy is currently firmly rooted within the constraints of the existing space industry. The current policy can be outlined as follows:

- to foster the development of innovative technology, its commercial exploitation and its application in research;
- to assist the UK space industry in maximising business opportunities, particularly in the telecommunications and navigation sectors, for the benefit of society as a whole;
- to pursue highest quality space science;
- to improve knowledge of the environment and its resources through Earth Observation;
- to communicate the results and their significance to a broad audience.

More ambitious objectives

The UK is currently one of the world leaders in satellite technology. The British National Party believes that although our present space objectives are worthy goals and should be pursued, they do not go far enough. Previous governments have had little understanding of the true potential of space technologies. The objectives that such governments have set are therefore over-conservative. When governments set over-conservative goals, they miss opportunities. Industry leaders have criticised the Labour government for persistent under-investment in space industry.

Competition

In the real world it must be accepted that a great many developing nations will soon have overall technical capabilities, which equal or surpass those of the UK. Many of these nations already possess advanced manufacturing economies. A few developing nations will soon be able to offer potential customers services that the UK cannot presently provide. Both India and China have developed commercial launch technologies. Many of these launch systems will soon be able to undercut the European Ariane. The UK currently has no independent launch technologies. In fact, the Labour and Conservative governments have persistently missed opportunities to develop space launch technologies. Britain's Black Arrow programme was already at the prototype stage, when the Conservative government cancelled it.

An independent policy

Efforts to develop technologies in co-operation with our European neighbours are not always appropriate for UK industries. It must be remembered that all EU nations are in competition with one another. Over reliance on European co-operation, will allow other nations to narrow British space policy and may even threaten Britain's lead in the space sector. Co-operation should certainly take place, but independent technologies should also be developed.

A small BNP working party has been in touch with space scientists and engineers for some time. These efforts have allowed us to develop an extensive space policy. The BNP has not limited itself to the two-dimensional thinking of Labour or Conservative space policies. Just because something has not been done, does not mean that it cannot be done.

Reaching into the Cosmos

Our policy is designed to build upon the existing space policy, in a way that will enormously extend the UK's reach into the Cosmos. By utilising materials that are already located in space, a future BNP Government will provide Britain with a large, manned space programme. The programme will enormously extend Britain's capabilities as a space faring nation and will be, above all, affordable. Our policies are:

- 1) For the UK to develop her own launch technologies, including commercial satellite Launch Vehicles, heavy lift vehicles, re-usable space vehicle technology and separate launch facilities.
- 2) The development of a strategy that would allow exploration of not just the Earth's resources, but also the resources of the Moon and the asteroids.
- 3) The development of technologies, that would permit manned exploratory missions to other solar system bodies. Technologies that assist colonisation of space will be actively pursued.
- 4) The development of technologies that would allow the UK to make use of the resources that are already located at the top of Earth's gravity well. These resources include empty rocket stages, defunct satellites, lunar and asteroidal resources.

BRITISH SPACE PROGRAMME

5) A separate 'Ministry for Space' should be created within the UK government. The ministry would have its own budget, which would be set by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

6) The implementation of a long term programme (10-15 years) that would allow the UK to develop Solar power satellites. These would provide the Earth with a cheap, environmentally benign source of energy.

7) Britain's withdrawal from the Outer Space Treaty.

National ambitions

The British Space Policy is geared towards the pursuit of British national ambitions in space. The first directive of the policy is essential if the UK intends to engage in large-scale space projects outside of Europe. Manned missions to Mars and the Moon will require the use of Heavy Lift Vehicles. These vehicles are capable of lifted upwards of several tens of tonnes of materials, to low earth orbit.

Directives 2, 3 and 4 enable large-scale results to be obtained. Enormous amounts of money can be saved and time-scales can be shortened, by utilising materials that are already located at the top of the Earth's gravity well. Without this premise, it is unlikely that large projects (such as manned missions to other solar system bodies) would be at all possible in the long term. The resources of most interest are:

- The intense solar energy which is available everywhere, 100% of the time, except in the shadows of planetary bodies.

- The abundant resources of silicon, oxygen, various metals, ilmenite and anorthite, available in limitless amounts on the surface of the Moon.

- The potential resources of the near-earth asteroids. These include water and organic compounds, essential to life. They are also rich in substances rarely found on Earth, such as platinum group metals.

By utilising the various resources of other near-earth bodies, especially the Moon, the enormous cost associated with lifting heavy materials into space can be saved. The Moon's weak gravity and lack of atmosphere, make possible the use of electromagnetic launching machines, located on the lunar surface. These are entirely reusable and they can themselves, largely be constructed using lunar resources. This reduces the cost of placing such machines on the Moon.

Complexities

There are a great many items that cannot be manufactured in space and must be produced on Earth. These items will leverage themselves to achieve a high degree of payback. Materials launched from Earth are: People, information, complex mechanical parts and sophisticated tools.

Most, if not all, heavy items will be manufactured in space, using space resources and will not be launched from Earth. These include: Oxygen, space station modules, heavy pressure vessels, food, water, glass panels and eventually solar panels, for the production of electric power.

It is not generally understood, just how large the benefits are of using materials that are already at the top of Earth's gravity well. At present, all materials used in space systems are lifted from the Earth's surface, which sits at the bottom of this gravity well.

The ratio of a rocket lift-off mass to the final payload mass, delivered to a geo-stationary orbit about the Earth is about 100 to one. The rest of the mass is made up of the rocket vehicle itself and the enormous quantity of fuel that it must carry, in order to reach orbit. To make matters worse, the vehicles that launch payloads into orbit, are non reusable.

Cutting high launch costs

All of these factors result in earth-to-space launch costs being extortionately high. The extortionately high cost tends to limit the use of such rocket systems. This effectively eliminates all possibility for mass production of rocket systems and pushes the price up even further. It is this high price tag that has tended to limit the scope of all national space missions of the past.

Making use of resources that are already located in space effectively breaks this chain of logic. Programmes that seem fantastical to us today, such as establishment of British colonies on the planet Mars, could be accomplished affordably if lunar resources were used to facilitate them.

Re-usable rocket vehicle programmes, that reduce the cost of payloads delivered to orbit, have been tried and have so far failed. Many possible launch systems have been suggested. The electromagnetic launchers that we would use in order to launch materials from the Moon cannot be used on the Earth's surface due to the presence of the Earth's atmosphere. Reusable rocket systems that make use of the oxygen in the Earth's atmosphere show the most long-term promise. Reaching orbit from the Earth's surface is never likely to be cheap by everyday standards, but the use of these reusable rocket systems may eventually reduce launch costs to Earth orbit by a factor of 100.

Technical difficulties

There are enormous technical difficulties that must be overcome before such systems can be put into service. It would be highly unwise for the UK to wait for such systems to be developed, before we embarked upon an expanded space programme.

It is likely that the earliest space resources to be used will be discarded rocket stages and possibly external tanks, from the US space shuttle. The upper stages of rockets are currently lifted all the way into space, only to be wasted. The fuel tanks of the upper stages are usable as pressure vessels for the creation of habitable volumes. The US Skylab space station was created in this way. The addition of lightweight insulation would allow the tank to be used for long term storage of propellants, such as oxygen.

Part 2 of this article will appear next month.

THE TRUTH BEHIND THE EURO LIES

With the advent of the Single European Currency, the pro-Euro propaganda barons have circulated the long established lie that British membership of the Euro would not lead to Britain becoming a province of a United Europe and the transfer of sovereignty to unelected bankers in Frankfurt and shadowy bureaucrats in Brussels. Using quotes from the architects of the Euro, we demolish the hollow claims of the Europhiles...

"The process of monetary union goes hand in hand, must go hand in hand, with political integration and ultimately political union. EMU is, and always was meant to be, a stepping stone on the way to a United Europe".

Wim Duisenburg, President of the European Central Bank

"The top priority (is) to turn the EU into a single political state"

"Euro? It's already a federal arrangement! We've already given our sovereign power, our monetary sovereignty, to a bank".

Joschka Fischer, German Foreign Minister

"Of course, Britain could survive outside the EU...We could probably get access to the single market as Norway and Switzerland do..."

Tony Blair, Speech in Ghent, 23rd February 2000

"We'll negotiate withdrawal from the EEC which has drained our natural resources and destroyed jobs".

Tony Blair, election manifestos for Beaconsfield and Sedgfield 1982 and 1983

"A single currency is about the politics of Europe. It is about a Federal Europe by the back door."

John Major, former Prime Minister

"We want the political unification of Europe. If there is no monetary union, then there cannot be political union, and vice versa."

Helmut Kohl, former German Chancellor

"The European single currency is but a stepping stone to a political union".

Gerhard Schroder, German Chancellor

"The euro can only lead to closer and closer integration of countries' economic policies...This demands that member states give up more sovereignty."

Romano Prodi, European Commission President

The Death of the West

Chairman Nick Griffin reviews a new book from American Presidential candidate Pat Buchanan

Europe is going to be inundated by an Islamic-Arab-African invasion. The United States is going to become a Third World country. Most First World nations, including Japan, will be headed irreversibly down the road to extinction. And all these things are set, on present trends, to happen within the lifetime of many people reading this.

Such are the hard-hitting conclusions of best-selling American author, columnist and Presidential candidate Pat Buchanan in a stunning new book, The Death of the West. Just released, this has already climbed into Amazon's best-sellers list, and has received widespread publicity in the USA.

The book's conclusions

Using the most recent UN population studies, Buchanan concludes that:

- By 2050, only 10% of the world's people will be of European descent. One third of Europe's people will be over 60, and one-in-ten over 80;
- Between now and 2050, Asia, Africa, and Latin America will grow by three to four billion people -- 30 to 40 new Mexicos! -- as Europe will lose the equivalent of the entire population of Germany, Poland, Denmark,

Norway, Sweden, and Finland;

- By 2050, 23 million Germans will have disappeared along with 16 million Italians and 30 million Russians;

- The Islamic invasions of Spain and France in the eighth century, and of the Balkans and Central Europe from the 14th to the 17th centuries, will be re-enacted in the lifetime of most of those now living;

- It is the Christian nations -- Catholic, Protestant, and Orthodox -- that have begun to die. In a chapter titled, "Where Have All the Children Gone?" Buchanan explains why, and why it is unlikely the West can solve the demographic crisis before it leads to The Death of the West.

- White Americans are fleeing California at the rate of 100,000 a year. The entire southwest of the USA is being reconquered by Mexico.

- The history books of American state schools are being rewritten with the old heroes ignored or trashed and Western civilization disparaged and demeaned.

Sadly, this analysis looks all too accurate at present. But sadder still is the fact that Pat Buchanan himself - fine writer though he undoubtedly is - has in his own way contributed to the present desperate state of America.

Buchanan also to blame

He has done this by his repeatedly mishandled attempts to capture the US Presidency, in 1992, 1996 and 2000. First, in his early efforts, he insisted on standing as a Republican, thereby encouraging large numbers of good-hearted American patriots to pour vast amounts of effort and money into trying to 'reform' part of an utterly corrupt two parties/one system elective dictatorship.

When, despite the failings of his strategy, he took enough votes to get sufficient credibility and state funding to make a serious Third Party launch a viable option, he dithered for several years, telling supporters to stay in the Republican camp while the opportunity to build something fresh steadily slipped away.

Compounding the damage

Too late, he realised before the last Presidential election that the Republican option was a dead-end, and jumped ship at the last minute to the Reform Party. Having left this too late to make a real breakthrough, Buchanan then compounded the damage by allowing his ultra-liberal sister, Bay, to purge his campaign team of suspected 'racists'. Pat himself then completed the alienation of his natural support base by picking a left-wing black woman, Ezola Foster, as his Presidential running mate, and dodging the immigration issue in his campaign.

As a result, it was a total flop and the American 'right' suffered yet another catastrophic defeat. As a direct result of Buchanan's errors - which were chronicled every step of the way by high-profile commentators such as Dr Sam Francis - the largest white nation in the world is perhaps the only white nation in the world not to have even the embryo of a viable white survivalist party.

Up until now, Buchanan may have spoken out about immigration when he felt it was convenient, but he always avoided following his comments through to their logical conclusion. He opposed multiculturalism because it made integration harder, rather than because it was destroying the cultural base of his nation. He opposed mass non-white immigration because it was happening too quickly, rather than because it was wrong per se. He opposed multiracialism because it flew in the face of the "American dream," rather than because it was murdering the white race.

Buchanan a conservative

Unlike many others, Buchanan didn't take such a position out of cowardice. His outspoken condemnations of the excessive power of the Zionist lobby alone are sufficient to clear him of any suggestion that he hasn't got political 'balls.' No, Buchanan's problem is different, a consequence of his underlying character. In a nutshell, Pat Buchanan is a conservative.

As a political philosophy, conservatism has a great deal to commend it when the ship of state is basically on an even keel (though, in social and economic terms, there have been all too few moments in Western history when this can truly be said to have been the case). But in a country like the United States, where the commanding heights of the Establishment - the mass media, the economy, the political elite - are firmly in the hands of an alliance of anti-white vested interests and latter day Mensheviks, to be a conservative is to be pre-programmed for defeat.

Road to nowhere

Campaigning to resist the latest piece of multicultural insanity just isn't good enough under such circumstances, because even on the rare occasions when a little victory is won, it only slows down the rot, but can never reverse it. Even if they don't get their way at once, the left-liberals regroup and try again; always on the attack, whereas the conservatives have their campaign and then - win or lose - go back to sleep until the next threat emerges.

Furthermore, conservatism might work when the economic power of Big Money is on the conservative side. In America, as throughout the world, however, the really big money - the Coca-Colas, the McDonalds, the Microsoft and the Fords - is all on the same side as the modern Mensheviks. Culture, tradition, ethnic identity - all these things prized by genuine conservatives - get in the way of maximum profit, so they've all got to go.

Under such circumstances, it is unforgivable to complain about the imminent destruction of the white race, but to refuse to take part in a serious effort to build a political movement dedicated to reversing the present destructive trends, first in one's own country and later on a global basis.

The way it must be done

This must be done through the ballot box, through constructive work in local communities, and through a wide variety of totally peaceful and legal cultural and counter-power initiatives. But the necessary policy of strict legality mustn't blind us to the fact that this is, in the truest sense, a revolutionary position.

And a revolutionary position needs a revolutionary party - not one that runs around waving bombs or even banners with scary slogans, but one which knows where it's going, and what it intends to do when it gets there. Buchanan was never going to form, or fit in with, such a party. So while his latest excellent book is to be welcomed, no one should be fooled into thinking of him as the Great White Hope.

FILM REVIEW: LO

The film starts off in darkness with a voice-over telling of the creation of the one Ring, followed by a series of clips of the Ring's real purpose - control of all other Magical Rings - showing how the Dark Lord used the greed of men for power to enslave them to his will. From the hush in the cinema, it was clear that the audience were enthralled from these opening shots. Then it runs into a brief but spectacular scene of the great battle of the second age, where seemingly the Dark Lord is defeated. This is a sneak preview of the greater battles to come in the next two films in 2002 and 2003. We learn how, through greed, men allow the Dark Lord to rise again, by not destroying the Ring and putting their own personal interests before their people.

The film then changes pace again to the sleepy Shire home of the Hobbits. As in the book, life is well with the Hobbits as they are unaware of the fate in store for the whole of Tolkien's Middle Earth. Then enters Sir Ian McKellen as Gandalf the Wizard - one of the main protagonists in the film. Unfortunately it is a role which he can't live up to as he lacks the inner nobility of the character. This is a common problem through the film with some of the characters, but would be only spotted by devotees of Tolkien's work and does not spoil the whole cinematic experience of the film.

Hard work

From here, the pace picks up again to a break neck speed, trying to get as much of The Fellowship of the Ring into a three hour film as possible. That isn't easy given the detailed writing of the author. Parts of the story are altered and some missed out all together, but when you are dealing with a film covering such subjects of friendship, honour, duty, love for your people and homeland, treason, betrayal to the dark powers and the consequences of this, to name a few, it's "bloody" hard work.

Political message?

This for a book which directors have said was "unfilmable". It does beg the question was the film "unfilmable", or was it the themes that were too hot to handle for the mainstream film industry? So it was left to a little-known New Zealand director of dodgy horror films, Peter Jackson, to try. The studios had nothing to lose (except the production costs) if it flopped or got the CRE or the US equivalent on to them. But if Mr Jackson pulled it off, he won't be the only one raking in the money.

Lord of the Rings has been used for allegories from every spectrum of political view. What can't be disputed is that this film captures the truth in the book. This is that when a force of evil wishes to destroy your people, your culture and very existence, you have a straight choice: do you fall under its spell and betray your own people? Or do you stand up and fight against it even if it seems hopeless?

Lesson to learn

Tolkien is quite clear on this: you fight! Even the seemingly peaceful Hobbits of the Shire - they who seem the weakest of all, can have the bravest of hearts. As it is clearly acknowledged, the Hobbits were intended by Tolkien to represent the spirit of the English, so there is a lesson to be learnt here.

One of the most memorable parts of the book is closely followed in the film with Boromir (played by Sean Bean) after falling for the spell of the Ring's power of seduction and frightening Frodo (Elijah Wood).

Boromir tempted by the power of the Ring, the power of the Ring could solve all the troubles of his people, but he would become a slave of the Dark Lord

Members of the Orc horde, servants of the Dark Lord, who have been corrupted by the power of evil

Now distraught, realising what he has done, he finds Merry and Pippin in danger from a new breed of Orc more evil than any before, created - 'genetically altered' to use a modern term - by the Traitor Saruman (Christopher Lee, who does still have that touch of malevolence about him). Boromir puts up a noble fight to save the Hobbits against overwhelming odds and doing so redeems himself for his earlier acts. He dies but kills many Orcs while being shot three times with arrows.

Then a little artistic licence comes in. As Merry and Pippin are carried off, the leading Orc prepares to finish Boromir, Aragorn (Viggo Mortensen) steps in. This doesn't happen in the book but it does the bizz in film sense. Aragorn dispatches the vile dark warrior in spectacular style. The response of the audience that I sat with was electrifying. Cheering and whistles as the Orc's head is removed from his shoulders!

Some of the comments I heard couldn't be repeated in anything put out by a respectable family party like the BNP! Needless to say, the audience all seemed to know who this type of Orc represented!

Characters

Then the death scene with Aragorn and Boromir was altered a little, and in fact was slightly improved with a change of dialogue.

Aragorn forgives Boromir for his treason as he has redeemed himself by giving his life to save the Hobbits in a selfless act. Boromir accepts Aragorn as "My Brother," "My Captain," "My King" and Aragorn promises that he will not let the White City (Gondor) or its people fall to the dark hordes of Sauron. At this point there wasn't a dry eye in the house.

The film has the ability to put you right there with the characters, as all great films do. Only a few hours before most people would have never heard of the characters.

Lighter moments

Lord of the Rings also has its lighter moments. One of the funniest clips is of the Dwarf Gimli (John Rhys-Davis). While trapped on a stairway in the mines of Moria, the band have to jump a gap to get to the other side of stairway before an unseen evil presence - the Balrog - attacks them. Boromir, Legolas (Orlando Bloom) and Gandalf have no problem jumping this gap but the Hobbits with their small stature can't do it. So Aragorn throws them over the gap, Legolas the Elf calls on Aragorn to toss Gimli across the gap. To this Gimli replies "No one tosses a Dwarf." All the adults in the audience got the joke!

So, to round it up if you are looking for a film totally following Tolkien's work you will be disappointed, but to be honest it is almost impossible to make such a film.

This is, however, a very good try. And it emerges as a work of art in its own right, and an excellent one at that. The special effects are fantastic, the backgrounds and artwork (most based on the work of artist Ted Nasmith) are lush and full-bodied. This is the best film I've seen this century and must be in the top five of all time.

This all promises greater things to come in the next two films, which have the biggest battles scenes in them as the forces of the Light and Dark meet for their final conflict.

Don't miss it! I'm going to read the book again now, and I suspect a lot of people who haven't read the original before will be doing the same over the next few weeks.

Another smear bites the dust!

"BNP in American funding scam" was a media smear that just wouldn't go away last year. Versions of the tale appeared in the News of the World, the Independent, on BBC radio and CNN television news. The claim was that the BNP had received thousands of dollars from supporters in the United States after new laws on party political funding made accepting such donations illegal.

Central to the whole tall story was extreme left-wing Labour Euro-MP Glyn Ford, who gave the fantasy journalistic 'legs' by lodging a complaint with the Electoral Commission. Mr Ford is no stranger to dodgy financial deals himself, and last year only escaped investigation into aspects of his own political and business finances by hiding behind European Parliamentary privilege.

Knowing that there was no truth whatsoever in the media's allegations, BNP

National Treasurer John Brayshaw had already asked the Electoral Commission to launch a formal investigation.

Our own request for an investigation was ignored, but fortunately Glyn Ford's was taken up. As a result, the BNP National Treasurer has now received formal notification that the party had indeed stayed within the law. Another media smear bites the dust! And yet again the motley crew of enemies and self-servers who delight in spreading anti-BNP smears must eat their words!

I am writing to advise you that the Commission has now completed its examination of the allegation that the British National Party (BNP) accepted impermissible donations from the American Friends of the British National Party (AFBNP). Having reviewed the available information relating to the funding activities of the BNP and AFBNP, we have concluded that that information discloses no grounds for any investigation of the allegation. Please feel free to contact me should you require any further explanation.

ASYLUM SEEKERS? TIME TO PUT OUR OWN PEOPLE FIRST!

Every year, hundreds of thousands of so-called 'asylum seekers' come to Britain and are immediately given free homes and full benefits - paid for by British taxpayers. This at a time when our schools are short of teachers, our hospitals are short of beds, and when our pensioners are forced to scrimp and save. The United Nations states that Britain is the most successful country to come to the shore that our asylum seekers travel across half the world, through many powerful countries, shows that they are coming to Britain because our generous welfare system makes us a soft touch.

Because of the huge influx of 'asylum seekers' hospital waiting lists are growing even faster. Asylum seekers are put to the front of the housing queue. Before local people. Up to five million new homes are being built on Green Belt land to make more room for population growth. According to the Home Office, the number of asylum seekers in the UK has risen from 10,000 in 1990 to 100,000 in 2000. 'We did the politicians ever ask the people if they wanted this? NO! It was forced on us, and if we don't pick up the courage to say NO to asylum seeking and immigration very soon, our children and grandchildren won't have a future in this land!

CRIME IS OUT OF CONTROL!

CRIME IN BRITAIN IS OUT OF CONTROL! Every time we switch on our TV or pick up a newspaper, we hear endless reports about murders, rapes, burglaries, car thefts and muggings. Britain used to be a peaceful country where crime was rare, where old ladies and children could walk the streets at night, without fear of mugging, rape or worse. People could leave their doors unlocked without fear of burglary. Whatever happened?

Newspapers and television are telling us that crime is out of control. In their homes, young children are abducted in parks and on the streets, cars and property are stolen every day from criminals. Our young people roam the streets, abandoned by the system to a life of crime and dependency. What has been done about the crime explosion? Nothing! The courts and the judges are too soft, the politicians are too soft, the police are too soft, the police have their hands too firmly behind their backs. Society seems powerless against the criminal. What is going wrong?

Believe it or not, it all starts with your vote! To put it bluntly, if you vote Lib-Lab-Con, you vote for crime and anarchy on your streets! It's as simple as that! The police have to be allowed to do their job, without interference from politically correct Lib-Lab-Con politicians, and the judges and the courts have got to apply stricter sentences. The British National Party is the party of law and order. The only party in Britain that will stand up to the criminals and protect the public. By voting Lib-Lab-Con, you vote for crime, by voting BNP you vote for a crackdown on crime. Simple choice!

□ Crime leaflet drawing attention to the explosion of insecurity and lawlessness on our streets. Price £8 for 1,000.

IMMIGRATION?

According to Britain's leading population experts, the native British people will be a minority in this country by about 2060, thanks to hundreds of thousands of immigrants and 'asylum seekers' pouring into Britain every year on ships, cars, planes and lorries. We're already a minority in places like Leicester and inner London - the old politicians are giving our country away!

In many towns and cities, anti-BNP race attacks and riots are now commonplace. 'Political correctness' means that businesses are forced to employ immigrants before British workers under the guise of 'gender' and 'race equality' put immigrants and native workers to the front of the housing queue.

The Government is going about with plans to build up to five million new homes on the Green Belt land to cope with the increase in the UK's population over the next 60 years. British culture are now endangered because they might offend our new multicultural children - however, unless multiculturalism is abolished.

Our people have become second class citizens of their own land. And all this while, immigrants account for only 5% of the 'gross value added'.

Is this the future you want for your children and grand children? A future where our people are treated as second class citizens? A future where the British people will be a minority? The British National Party

A ROUND UP OF THE MONTH'S PARTY NEWS

■ December's Leicester meeting was addressed by our Information Technology officer Simon Darby. 25 guests heard Simon's behind-the-scenes account of working with Panorama, and demolition of the programmes' many lies. Leicester's own Graham Eustace also spoke, giving an informative account of the "glory days" of British nationalism in the city in the 1970s, and seeking to draw lessons for the future from what went right - and wrong.

■ The first Scottish BNP St. Andrew's Day event for several years was held in Paisley on 1st December. Members from all over the country heard speeches from local stalwart Steve Cartwright, Deputy Chairman Scott McLean and guest of honour Nick Griffin. A novel idea was tried out during the afternoon, with the audience being divided into three discussion groups and rotated through the different subjects covered. This proved very successful, with the discussions on sectarianism and the design of a new specifically Scottish logo for the party in North Britain being particularly useful. The event ended with a short ballad set by John from Nemesis, and key officials spent the evening discussing future plans.

■ Coventry BNP's keen band of activists was addressed by the BNP's national administration secretary Chris Green and Young BNP leader Mark Collett. Chris enthused the audience with a selection of anecdotes, facts and figures which show how quickly the BNP is growing. Mark Collett - fast growing in confidence as a public speaker - also gave an excellent talk, on the YBNP generally, and the battle for free speech at Leeds university in particular. Both speakers touched on the Panorama hatchet job, and how it seemed to have backfired on its out-of-touch creators.

■ 73 members and supporters attended yet another very successful Oldham branch meeting. Chaired by tireless local organiser Mick Treacy, it was also addressed by long-standing North West activist Peter Rushton and by a new member who explained how much support the party now has in his own area, Saddleworth. After a break and buffet, BNP chairman Nick Griffin gave a review of the year, highlighting the way in which the hard work of party activists in Oldham had played such a key role in the party's success and growing popularity nationwide. He also played extracts from the audio recording "Islam - a threat to us all," and explained that there were only a few days before Blunkett's proposed new Heresy Law would probably make such intelligent but frank criticism of Islam liable to a seven-year prison sentence. Mr. Griffin finished with a warning that, while the BNP could conceivably win a number of seats in the town next May, this would not happen unless more people came forward and got active, particularly canvassing.

■ At least 100 people, mostly local and including around thirty children, enjoyed a Christmas Social organised by fast-growing Dewsbury BNP. Highlight of the day for the youngsters was a visit by Father Christmas, while the adults enjoyed a splendid buffet laid on by the same hard-working ladies whose previous effort featured on Panorama! The party congratulates Nick Cass and his team for all the hard work over the last year, which has really put the party on the town's political map.

■ The local election campaign launch meeting for Bexley branch was held on the 6th December addressed by local candidate Colin Smith, chaired by local organiser James Seadon, with guest speaker Director of Publicity Paul Golding. Held in the heart of Northend ward, where the party obtained 26% of the vote in a by-election two years ago, local man Paul Golding spoke of the changes he had witnessed growing up in the area, in particular the large and sudden influx of asylum-seekers and other foreigners.

■ A meeting of the newly formed Watford group was one of the last speaking engagements for party chairman Nick Griffin in December 2001. Mr. Griffin gave a brief review of some of the highlights of the previous year. "In a 'white flight' area such as this, everyone knows what to be afraid of. Our job is to give them hope as well." The collection raised nearly £200 and most present collected bundles of BNP calling cards to pass to friends, workmates and relations.

Great Britain: a safe haven for Islamic terrorists...

There was a deafening silence from Tony Blair and his New Labour Government in response to the blistering attack on Britain by Egyptian President Mubarak. The Egyptian Premier's unprecedented criticism that Britain is a safe-haven for Islamic terrorists, who enjoy the country's hospitality at the expense of the United Kingdom taxpayer, was made at the beginning of November, a full six weeks before shoe bomber Richard Reid was to step into the limelight.

Egyptian President Mubarak

There was silence from the Government because they know President Mubarak is right. Of course Reid, who was prepared to kill himself along with 197 crew and passengers on American Airlines Flight 63 in the name of Islam, was a home-grown terrorist. But his recruitment into terrorism was conducted by imported Islamic terrorists enjoying the hospitality of the United Kingdom taxpayer. Abdul Haqq Baker, 35, chairman of the Brixton mosque in south-west London where Richard Reid worshipped, has no doubts as to where these terrorists are coming from.

Asylum seeking

They are foreign nationals who enter the country under the pretext of seeking political asylum but then go on to preach their rhetoric. They are a radical minority, but the traditional majority live in fear of them. There are hundreds of disaffected young Muslims tired of their parents understanding of Islam and how it is taught in the mosques. They like the fiery rhetoric of jihad; they like to hear that they are living among the infidel.

With 200,000 asylum seekers arriving in Britain during 2001, and the vast majority of them Muslim, not very many have to be potential terrorists to considerably bolster their numbers already living in Britain. Once here, the Home Office has permitted extremists such as Sheikh Omar Bakri to stay, despite their asylum applications having failed.

But it's not only through seeking asylum that this radical minority gets into Britain. The Home Office actually facilitates their arrival. 1,123 Imams from Pakistan were allowed into Britain in 2001, thanks to an immigration concession for ministers of religion.

Refusing to take action

Despite this constant refuelling of their numbers, and despite stinging criticism from abroad, the Government still refuses to take action. Why? Well it's certainly not because they are unaware of the problem, as former anti-terrorism intelligence officer Charles Shoebridge confirms, "The government has been aware for many years that, in certain mosques and universities, the recruitment, indoctrination and training by extremists of young Muslim men has been taking place."

Tony Blair might argue that his hands are tied because of the European Convention on Human Rights, which was incorporated into British law last year. It prohibits the deportation, or refusal of entry, of any foreign national - even if their presence is not conducive to the public good! But the real reason is that they are frightened of the power of the Islamic lobby in Britain as their recent attempt to gag criticism of Islam, by legislation against 'religious hatred', illustrated.

In December the Imam at the Feltham Young Offenders' Institution in west London, Abdul Rahman Qureshi, issued a leaflet, which was seized by the Prison Service, calling the US "the great evil, which must be wiped out." Director General of the Prison Service, Martin Narey, instead of condemning the leaflet said, "a reasonably tolerant attitude to all views has to be adopted."

Abusing the system

It's official pronouncements such as this, together with twenty years of 'positive discrimination' and mollicoddling from the authorities, that have given Britain's Muslim community an inflated status within the British Isles. They wouldn't take kindly to any heavy-handed treatment and have become accustomed to this special arrangement.

The Government always meets their demands as it did, for instance, in the case of the British Muslims convicted in Yemen of planning to murder British citizens - despite evidence which almost certainly would have secured conviction and far longer sentences before a British court.

There are more than 300 after-hours schools where young children are taught a brand of radical Islam, some even receiving Government grants.

They have come to expect the British authorities to accept forced marriages, female mutilation and extremist interpretations of jihad, as the ways of Islam and something that shouldn't be interfered with.

No other western nation gives such preferential treatment to its Muslim Community. To the British public the events of September 11th, Osama bin Laden, Richard Reid and the Taliban are just television images.

Islamic terrorism hasn't hit Britain and that is why the British public live side by side with a fifth column of terrorists and get on with their daily lives. Britain might be a safe-haven for Islamic terrorists, but at the moment it is also a safe-haven from Islamic terrorism.

Fifth column

This is why the government has fiddled while America burned. But when the next Richard Reid brings downs a holiday flight to Ibiza leaving in his wake a thousand British relatives grieving their loss, and a further two million holiday cancellations, that is when the British people will turn on this fifth column in their midst, that is when the Government will be forced to act, and that is when the question will be asked, "Why did we allow this to happen?"

Martin Wingfield

Born and raised in suburban London, Richard Reid now faces trial in the United States for allegedly trying to blow up a commercial flight using bombs hidden in his shoes.

DIRECTOR OF TECHNOLOGY SIMON DARBY EXPLAINS HOW THE BNP CELEBRATED CHRISTMAS

With all that has gone on in the East Anglian city of Peterborough over the last year, it seemed to be the obvious location from which to shoot our Christmas message. For all of us living in or near to major urban areas it has always been a great comfort to think that there are still large areas of our country that are still relatively unaffected by problems with which we are all too familiar. It is a very sad indication of the extent of social dislocation in modern day Britain that a small city like Peterborough is now no longer immune to the kind of problems blighting areas such as East London and the North of England.

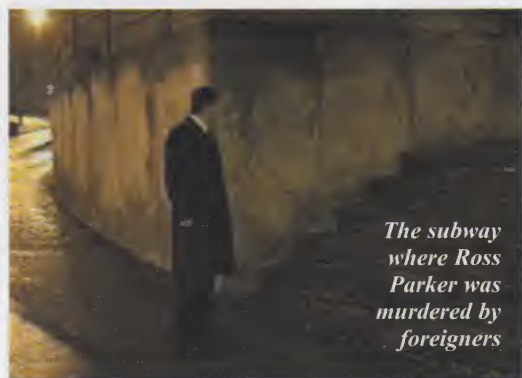

Katyn memorial in Staffordshire for the fourteen thousand Poles murdered by the communists in 1940

Most of the video was filmed within Peterborough Cathedral, which as many of you will already know was extensively damaged by arsonists a couple of months ago. The by-now traditional media black out on this incident - involving damage estimated at a staggering £4 million - will tell experienced readers all they need to know about the likely identity and motivation of the arsonists.

The locations

It was quite amusing during Nick Griffin's video interview to see a succession of workman engaged in repair work drifting past, listening intently to what was being said.

The subway where Ross Parker was murdered by foreigners

Word had obviously got around that the British National Party were filming and as it was obvious that the repair work was taking second place to our own efforts. After around an hour we made a donation to the repair fund, thanked all the staff and made our way out to the city centre.

None of us were looking forward to working on our next location and it was with a grim determination that we moved through the early evening drizzle to a local pub to get the directions. The reaction of the locals when asked for the exact spot where 17-year-old Ross Parker was beaten and stabbed to death by a gang of Muslims was particularly telling.

Despite all the glossing over this terrible incident an atmosphere of fear and suspicion grips Peterborough. "There were ten of them" was all the locals would tell us, believing us to be a film crew from Channel Four. The pub landlord, an Ulsterman who was still deeply upset by Ross's murder, actually ordered his customers not to talk to us.

As we left we were told to "watch our backs around there," it was almost like the scene in the "Slaughtered Lamb" in the film "An American Werewolf in London".

Young Ross forgotten

Having found the spot where Ross was killed we shot the video and left, all of us shaken by what we had found in the cold subway. No flowers, still less a Stephen Lawrence-style memorial plaque.

A friend of his clearly felt the same anger at the way it seemed that Ross's life had counted for nothing. But even a simple spray-painted message was clearly unacceptable to the anti-white mentality which prevails in that part of Peterborough. "Ross Parker - RIP" had had the final 'P' scrubbed off with some kind of paint stripper. We could only hope that Ross's family do not have to use the route.

The final part of the video involved a short piece from Peterborough city centre explaining how the British people are no longer even allowed to celebrate Christmas properly owing to the stifling, systematic encroachment of liberal multiculturalism. As with so many other municipal Christmas decorations, Peterborough's were not just de-Christianised, but totally filleted of any recognisably traditional content. Angels and cribs were the first to go, lest they 'offend' non-Christian minorities, but reindeer and Father Christmas have gone down the memory hole too these days; after all, the depiction of living creatures is unacceptably unIslamic!

Most popular video

This last scene was spliced with a 'heavier' political piece shot earlier in the day at the Katyn memorial in Staffordshire for the fourteen thousand Poles murdered by the Communists in 1940. Mr. Griffin explained the similarity between the mentality behind that massacre and today's PC totalitarianism.

The video was completed and uploaded to the website on December 19th. Within one week it had become our most popular video download ever. This was a fitting end to a marvellous year for our Internet operation, which continues to be a constant thorn in the side to those who are fearful of the truth.

NEWGRANGE BURIAL SITE

According to the lyrics penned by the Irish folk band Clannad, forgotten are the builders of an impressive stone burial chamber called Newgrange on the east coast of Ireland. From studies of archaeology, and more importantly genetic mapping techniques we now know who built this immense burial tomb and stone ring which stands close to the River Boyne in Co. Meath some twenty miles north of Dublin.

Using radio carbon dating it has been determined that the turf layers which alternate with layers of local stone used in its construction date back to at least 3200BC. That makes the structure even older than the Great Pyramids of Egypt - and our ancestors built it! As many readers will have seen from the BBC series "Blood of the Vikings", the genetic makeup of inhabitants of the British Isles has been largely unchanged for millennia.

Ancestral links

This has been based on studies of several researchers working independently and supports previous archaeological evidence which dismisses claims that Britons are a mongrel nation of Germanic and Celtic immigrants. The people that were responsible for the construction of this marvel in Co. Meath which combined advanced knowledge of both civil engineering and astronomical calculations live on; some 200 generations later their descendants live in all parts of the British Isles from Donegal to Kent, Caithness to Cornwall and most of the present inhabitants of the British Isles are in direct descent from these Neolithic builders.

200,000 visitors a year from around the world gaze in awe at the incredible structure (megolith) which somewhat oval in shape is nearly 300ft in diameter at its widest point.

It is believed to be an ancient burial cairn as well as a celestial observatory and place for religious ceremonies. Three smaller chambers are located around the side of the larger and empty main long inner chamber. These smaller chambers once housed the dead of the tribe and the inner chamber would have been used for the rituals of internment. Remains of several human cremations were discovered here.

Strange alignments

The eastern entrance is in perfect alignment to the winter solstice sunrise and, from December 19th to 23rd, at sunrise (weather permitting!) a shaft of sunlight shines through an opening just above the main entrance along the tunnel, some 90ft long and onto the back wall of the inner chamber, illuminating the chamber with the sun's rays at what would be its lowest point in the yearly cycle. The purpose of such a light show is still a matter of speculation. Various ideas have been suggested about the nature of the tunnel; some say it symbolizes our birth from our mothers' dark wombs through a tunnel into the light or our passage to the "afterlife" again through a tunnel of light.

There is a circle of massive stones (kerbstones) laid horizontally around the cairn itself. Then outside the main ring is a ring of upright standing stones. These are also positioned in such a way to align with the prominent astronomical events of the year, concluding that the builders knew much about astronomy and the passage of the seasons.

Architectural brilliance

There is a brilliance of stone artwork all over the site. There is a complex array of geometric symbols on the cairn itself and on the huge kerbstones. There are ornate spirals, zigzags, concentric circles, human faces and triangles sculpted into the rock. It is thought they represent the ancients' understanding of the night sky.

The shape of the building itself and its highly polished stone layers are no accident and Newgrange held another secret only very recently unveiled. In summer 2001, a team of researchers from Reading University carried out tests which revealed that the building produced eerie acoustic effects inside the chamber. Sounds were intensified where it was thought spectators of the rituals would once have stood. These acoustics may have been used by tribal "priests" to conjure up powerful emotions within the spectators, possibly trying to replicate a sense that the noises came from the dead entombed in the side passages.

Newgrange is only part of a much larger collection of megalithic mounds all around this area of Co. Meath and part of a much greater mystery which suggests alignment to a constellation of stars called Cygnus (the swan). The importance of these stars is their relatively fixed positions in the northern skies and it is possible that the ancients closely observed the stars' movements enabling them to calculate the length of the year, marking positions of both sun and moon and enabling them to draw up a yearly calendar. All this undertaken without computers or handheld calculators suggesting a high degree of intelligence.

Intelligence

One of the reasons for such intense interest in Newgrange over recent decades is that, unlike many of the stone circles on mainland Britain which are open and have no roof, Newgrange seems to have been a purpose built wholly enclosed and roofed structure. What undiscovered mysteries, what rituals, what unknown magic took place within?

Whatever the answer it has to be concluded that our ancestors of over 200 generations ago were highly intelligent, socially organized, reverential to their dead, and avid observers of the great cycles of the natural world. As our own interminable technological progress continues we will doubtless know more in the near future about the mysteries of our ancient past.

Stand at Rorke's Drift: An example of British heroism

It was South African summer in 1879 at the small mission built by James Rorke in the Natal Province. The British Army had commandeered the buildings and used them as a supply depot for the troops advancing into Zululand. 50 wounded and 80 regulars of the 2nd battalion 24th Warwickshire Regiment remained at the base.

On the 22nd January two young lieutenants galloped in with the news of the British defeat at Isandlwana and to report a wing of the Zulu army was heading in their direction. As they rode off to Helpmekaar for urgent assistance, Lts. Chard and Lt. Bromhead continued frantically with preparations to defend Rorke's Drift. Using mealie bags, two ox wagons and biscuit boxes they were able to construct a makeshift line of defence.

The threat

Soon after 4 p.m. the lookout warned of the approach of the Zulus. Lt. Chard's men faced an army of about 4000 warriors armed with spear and rifle. This force consisted mainly of the Undi Corps, who were fighting fit as they had taken almost no part in the fighting at Isandlwana.

The first attack began at about 4.30. The Zulus swung around the hill towards the south wall of the defences coming so close that they could grab the soldier's bayonets. Fierce hand-to-hand combat took place. The Zulu forces broke through onto the veranda of the hospital and set the thatch roof on fire, forcing the defenders to evacuate this building. As all the rooms opened on to the veranda and there were no interleading doors, this forced the men to defend each doorway while others dug through the walls with their bayonets and evacuated the sick.

While this evacuation of the hospital building was taking place, a small wall of mealie bags was built between the biscuit box wall and the stone kraal. The burning thatch roof lit up the area and made it possible for the British soldiers to see their foe. The Zulus continued to attack all night and finally withdrew at about 4 a.m.

Heroism

The defenders remained at their posts until the arrival of Lord Chelmsford and his troops at about 7 a.m. The British lost 17 killed and the Zulus an estimated 500. A record number of 11 Victoria Crosses were awarded to the defenders of Rorke's Drift. Through careful co-ordinated volleys, group discipline, shared sacrifice, superior training, and individual initiative these heroes from Wales had withstand an army of overwhelming numbers.

REVIEWS OF THE MONTH

No Pound: No Independence? (Dr B Burkitt)

For those who saw the media attempts in early January to glorify the launch of the Euro, this short erudite pamphlet provides one of the best antidotes for those who wish to retain our sovereignty, and as such should be required reading for all patriots in the dangerous months and years ahead when all the stops will be pulled out by our masters to spin the United Kingdom into the Euro. Simply put you cannot have political sovereignty without economic sovereignty. Just as the Zollverein Customs Union in 1834 led to the Unification of Germany under the Kaiser, so the Euro will of necessity lead to a United States Of Europe. The booklet is particularly useful in debunking the economic case for the Euro; for example its proponents argue that because 310 million people use the Euro, it is a strong currency, but 1 billion people use the Rupee and but no one suggests currency union with India. Similarly if size matters, why is the Swiss Franc universally recognised as the strongest currency in the world? In the near future the BNP is going to be at the forefront of our nation's struggle to retain the pound, it is therefore beholden on all members to educate themselves about the dangers inherent in giving away our sovereignty and joining Euroland. In this regard they will find this book tremendously useful.

Battles in Britain (1066-1746) (William Seymour)

Thanks to the new management of Freedom Books over the past few months a number of excellent acquisitions have been added to the catalogue, and this book at only £8.75 is an good example. Like most people over thirty I was brought up on a historical diet which thankfully included the martial valour of our ancestors. Sadly for the present generation the National Curriculum is more likely to concentrate on the Slave Trade rather than on Agincourt and Crecy and that is to the detriment of our country and society. The book is not a catalogue of English triumphs; Bannockburn is well covered, which will doubtless please our readers north of Carlisle; as is the Battle Of Hastings, which incidentally was a near run thing. Had the English militia not charged after the Normans downhill to be in turn slaughtered by their cavalry, Harold Godwinson would today be celebrated as a formidable warrior and statesman which he certainly was. I have a particular interest in The Hundred Years War and particularly the campaigns of the Black Prince, this book covers them brilliantly, in many ways his victory at Poitiers when he captured the French King was an even more breathtaking feat of arms than his father's victory at Crecy. This is an excellent book to be enjoyed by people of all generations who are proud of our history!

Race (JR Baker)

This academic study of racial differences remains one of the foremost textbooks on the subject available. Surprisingly it is also extremely readable and provides a veritable treasure trove for those who need to combat the Boaz school of anthropology, and its stepchild, rabid egalitarianism. The book runs to over six hundred pages and discusses the anatomical differences between the races of man and the differences in cranial capacity between the Caucasoid, Mongoloid and Negroid races, and as such gives an excellent grounding in the subject for those wishing to study the later work of J Phillippe Rushton, Professor Michael Levin and the groundbreaking work of Herrnstein & Murry in The Bell Curve. At £25 the book is not cheap but it compares very well with some of the important anthropological works published by Praeger Publishers which currently retail at over £60 each. Whilst the BNP and its members are in no way 'racist', we do like all realists recognise the evidence of our senses in that all the races of man have particular attributes and we recognise and glory in this human diversity.
